HEALTH AND HOMELESSNESS IN UTAH

Health and housing are so inextricably interdependent that it is impossible to be successful in one without the other. People cannot pay for housing without the presence of good health; it is impossible to achieve good health without a safe, permanent home.

An example of this interconnectedness is brought to life in that homeless people are three to four times as likely to experience illnesses than those who are housed.

Bankruptcy is a major cause of homelessness, and 62 percent of all personal bankruptcies in the United States result from health problems.

WELCOME TO FOURTH STREET CLINIC

Fourth Street Clinic helps homeless Utahns improve their health and quality of life by providing health care and support services. With consistent health care, our patients live longer and healthier lives and often find the hope necessary to break the homeless cycle. In 2008, Fourth Street Clinic served nearly 6,000 homeless patients.

HISTORY

The mid-1980s brought an economic revitalization to Salt Lake City's downtown that included the demolition and redevelopment of many substandard housing units otherwise known as Single-Room Occupancy Hotels (SROs). Many of these downtown SROs were homes to Salt Lake's lowest-income residents: leases and deposits were not required and rooms could be had for a few dollars a night. Very often SRO residents worked odd jobs within walking distance as janitors or watchmen. When roughly 800 housing units were torn down, 1,000 residents were instantly displaced and cut off from their homes and jobs. Overnight, Salt Lake's homeless population exploded. Prior to the 1980s, homelessness in Utah was a random, isolated and often a temporary phenomenon. Now it can be predicted, intergenerational and permanent.

With the help of federal funding, Allan Ainsworth PhD, founded Fourth Street Clinic in 1988 to give this newly homeless, uninsured and often very sick population access to primary care services and a chance at health and new housing. Opening with a part-time nurse and relying heavily on hospitals for treatment, Fourth Street Clinic is now a full-service health home that offers coordinated primary care, behavioral health, specialty care and pharmacy services. Forty staff members, 65 in-house volunteers and over 200 off-site specialists who see patients on a pro bono basis serve nearly 6,000 patients each year.

FROM THE DIRECTOR

Fourth Street Clinic felt the effects of the 2008 economic downturn long before the year-end statistics confirmed the growing number of people who became uninsured and homeless. In total, 2008 left an additional 9,200 Utahns bankrupt<sup>1</sup>, 19,480 uninsured<sup>2</sup> and 1,150 homeless<sup>3</sup>. Of those who filed for bankruptcy, 62 percent (5,700) fell into financial hard times due to health problems; three-quarters of these filers had health insurance, two-thirds owned their home, and three-fifths had gone to college<sup>4</sup>. Clearly, 2008 was a tipping point that brought many middle-class Utahns into a new world of financial instability and illness as they struggled to meet their basic human needs.

Not all of these Utahns will fall into homelessness, but many will—challenging our stereotypes that homelessness is the plight of the transient, middle-aged, male alcoholic. In fact, 70 percent of our homeless population once had a home and worked in Utah, and women and children are the fastest growing segment.

What is confirmed are the effects of good health and access to ongoing health care services on quality and longevity of life. With good health comes the chance for economic stability and with poor health comes a daily struggle for survival. If we are to ever be successful in staving off the tide of newly bankrupt and newly homeless people, or if we are to have any success in finally breaking the homeless cycle for those suffering from chronic homelessness, we have to have increased access to health care for everyone, including the poorest of the poor and the sickest of the sick. We applaud the great work of Salt Lake County area homeless agencies who have begun to make more housing affordable to those transitioning out of homelessness. Lives have been changed due to these efforts. More housing coupled with affordable health care services can end suffering and homelessness in Utah. We are proud to make home health visits to those approximately 440 formerly homeless people who now have permanent affordable housing. However, with The Salt Lake Tribune reporting that one in 10 homeowners are currently in mortgage trouble, we hope that great public strides will be made to prevent these currently housed people from joining the unprecedented number of Utahns who are seeking community assistance for the first time.

Sincerely,

Allan D. Ainsworth, PhD Executive Director

PROGRAMS & SERVICES

Our 40 staff members and 65 in-house volunteers provide the following integrated health care services on-site. There is no cost to access any service with the exception of a $15 lens grinding charge for eye glasses.

Fourth Street Clinic also refers patients to more than 200 medical specialists in the community who see our patients on a pro bono basis. Intermountain Health Care is a generous supporter of this program and donates its facilities and specialty equipment when a network physician agrees to see a Fourth Street Clinic patient.
